The Quattro Firm: Balancing a Family and a Business

By: Nicole McNamara Quattrocchi

Managing a family is no easy task. When one also owns a business, succeeding at both may seem impossible.

When the Quattro Firm opened its doors in June of 2015, it seemed like continuing to be what my husband and I affectionately refer to, as the “dominant parent” would be easy. I could make my own hours, manage the firm and the clients and still be present at every school holiday event, picture day as well as conduct all the “pick ups” and “drop offs.” This was the plan, but I was sadly mistaken to believe that I could continue to do it all on my own.

When the firm began, we consisted of an attorney, a J.D. aspiring to gain her license and a paralegal. While it expanded quickly to include a contract attorney and an accountant, I was still the one responsible for the “lion’s share” of the work. Due to the nature of my husband’s job, I was also doing the “lion’s share” at home. As we began with only three clients, this was still working quite well for the first few months without any real ramifications to either the business or my family.

However, as life often does, things changed and they changed quickly. The firm began to become busier, certain member of the staff became restless, and my family received a rather devastating blow in the form of a pre-4s class at the time and her newest addition who was almost 2. The enrollment was completely full within six months. The school remained full until the second building was open for business in 2004.

The Quattro Firm: Balancing a Family and a Business

I had a number of “balls in the air” and I knew that I couldn’t drop any.

People often underestimate the difficulty of being the primary caregiver to young children: it’s not all naps and puzzles. Being the primary caregiver means you are a lot of things: the chef, the housekeeper, the schedule-manager, the personal assistant who must provide snacks, juice boxes and toys on demand, the personal shopper for all clothing, uniforms, school supplies, groceries, etc., the entertainer, the bather, the teeth-brusher, the story-teller, the person in charge of picking them up and dropping them off and many other tasks and jobs with very few thanks or appreciation. Toddlers in particular are not known for their overflowing appreciation.

Managing a business means that you must review all work performed by others, including all the research, drafting, bills, and correspondence. It also means that the responsibility for all aspects rests on your shoulders and it’s your name that will be damaged if something is missed or a client is unhappy. As an attorney, one is also responsible for the legal work required of any particular case. Yet, as the founder and entrepreneur of the business, it requires that you have the ability to pay for all of the overhead expenses, employees, contractors, and all the other expenses that are required of a business. Above all of this is your duty to take care of your staff, your clients and

"Always be a first-rate version of yourself, instead of a second-rate version of somebody else."

and ensure each of their happiness.

It is often assumed that lawyers work too much, are uncaring, unsympathetic and only care about the bottom line. As someone who has built her practice on a foundation that we are compassionate lawyers who care about your entire situation, rather than just the legal problem that has brought you in today, falling in to the stereotype was not something that I was willing to do. I wanted the firm to be a success, but I refused to step on people and overcharge in order to do so.

In January of 2016, I realized a few things: I am not Wonder Woman, no matter how much I love to wear a tiara; I cannot do it all on my own; I'm not willing to let any aspect of my life suffer; and life will always throw a "curve ball" that you had never anticipated. Due to all of these, I had to make some changes that took several months to implement but that have been incredibly beneficial to the Quattro Firm, my family, and me.

I had to expand the staff and work out a new schedule with my children. I would still be the manager of the Quattro Firm and the primary caregiver, but I needed to assign some tasks to others in order to free up some of my own time to concentrate on the case work and keeping everyone happy. I also needed to arrange a different "pick up" and "drop off" schedule wherein my children would still have me as the "dominant parent," but on certain days they get to spend some additional time with family.

It takes a village to raise a family. It takes a devoted team to have a successful business. For us at the Quattro Firm, we have a strong village and we support the choice of primary caregivers to work and balance a family life with children. For me personally, I can't thank my team enough for helping me with the balance in my life.
